experience soon tells him that, however well settled principles of law may be, every case stands upon its own merits, and much depends upon it own peculiar circumstances, and as most cases of fraudulent preference, in England at least, are submitted to a jury, it is easy to conceive how important a bearing the relation in which the bankrupt and the creditor stood towards each other at the time of the transfer or payment has upon the issue. It is impossible, however, in so short an article as this, to go into these nice distinctions, which frequently arise. But the general doctrine, applicable to this class of cases, may be considered to be that all payments or transfers are good if the bankrupt was induced to make them by pressure of the creditor, but that if no pressure were employed, or he was not influenced by pressure, but acted voluntarily, and with a view to give the creditor a preference, and in contemplation of bankruptey, the payment or transfer is bad, although the bankrupt might hope to prevent a bankruptey. experience soon tells him that, however well settled principles of law may be, every case stands upon its own merits, and much depends upon it own pseuliar circumstances, and as most cases of fraudulent preference, in England at least, are submitted to a jury, it is easy to conceive how important a hearing the relation in which the bankript and the preditor stood towards each other at the time of the transfer or payment has upon the issue. It is impossible, however, in so short an article as this, to go into these nice distinctions, which framently arise. But the general doctrine, applicable to this class of cases, may be considered to be that all payments of transfers are good if the bankrupt was induced to make them by pressure of the creditor, but that if no pressure were employed, or he was not influenced by pressure, but acted voluntarily, and with a view to give the creditor a preference, and in contemplation of bankruptcy, the payment or transfer is bad, although the bankrupt might hope to prevent a bankruptsy. The jury, of course will look at the bankrupts conduct, his expharassments, his relation to the preferred creditors in each particular case, and collect from surrounding circummatages, the intent. By a comparatively late decision, it was held in substance that it was not recessary that a technical bankrupty should be contemplated. It will be apparent observed to in cases of fraud it punishes the bankrupt, and place the general body of creditors in the same position, as if the act had never been committed. experience soon tells him that, however well settled principles of law may be, every ease stands upon its own merits, and much depends upon it own pseuliar circumstances, and as most cases of fraudulent preference, in diagrand at least, are submitted to a jury, it is easy to conceive how important a bearing the relation in which the bankrupt and the well-to' stood towards each other at the time of the transfer or payment has upon the issue. It is impossible, however, in so short an article as this, to go into these nice distinctions, which frequently actually the general doctrine, applicable to this class of cases, may be considered to be that all payments or transfers are goodif the bankrupt was induced to make them by pressure of the creditor, but that if no pressure were employed, or hows not influenced by pressure, but acted voluntarily, and with a view to give the creditor a preference, and in contemplation of hankruptay, the payment or transfer is bad, although the bankrupt might hope to prevent a bankruptay. The jury of course will look at the bankruptes, the intent. By a comparatively late decision; it was held in substance that it was not necessary, that a technical bankruptay should be contemplated.
